Answer Explanation

More info on correct answer choices for this question: "help [command name]" and "[command name] /?"

Both commands work but not for all the tools in the command line, that is some of the utilities have help available when either of these commands is used (for example "help dir" and "dir /?"), but others such as network diagnostic utilities (ping, tracert, etc.) won't display help screen when "help [command name]" is used and require "[command name] /?" instead.

"[command name] /help" (which was reported multiple times by different users as a correct answer choice) was not included as a correct answer for this question because although it might display a help screen, Windows also lists "/help" as incorrect command switch (for example "bad option" after typing in "ping /help" displayed between the entered command and help contents). What it means is that in this case the help screen is displayed by default after adding any incorrect switch.
